

BACA CHART ONE—This diagram, and the one following, present a visual picture of how one single family like the Bacas descended and transcended in the production of a Chávez-Roybal combination, so much so that two separate charts had to be made. Note how the preponderance of Rio Abajo people pushes the names to the right side of the page, while the Santa Fe-Rio Arriba ancestors in the chart following pull the names in the opposite direction.

BACA CHART TWO—The first generations are the same in both diagrams. Then different children start divergent lines; but in some cases the same line contributes to both parents of this Chávez-Roybal combination. This saturation by the Bacas is a phenomenon that applies to practically every old New Mexico family. Certain ones tended to form separate groups or clans, due to social and regional influences, but the Baca influence cemented them all.
